Plenty of wow at BYU powwow

Rhonda DuVall of Taylorsville performs in an intertribal dance at the 23rd annual Harold A. Cedartree Powwow at Brigham Young University Saturday. The 15-hour event was attended by tribes from throughout the United States. Activities included Native American dancing competitions, a drum contest and arts and crafts booths. Sponsored by BYU's Multicultural Student Services and The Tribe of Many Feathers, the event capped off BYU's Heritage Week activities.

Coal miners in Emery County are facing a 12-mile commute. And that's after they get to work.

In the canyons above Huntington, the coal-mining tunnels that worm their way into the rich coal deposits have expanded to the point that the tunneled area is now about the size of Salt Lake City. And miners find themselves riding as travel underground," said Mary Ann Wright, associate director of mining for the Utah Division of Oil, Gas, and Mining (UDOGM), the agency overseeing the project, delegated by the Interior Department's Office of Surface Mining (OSM).

"It will take about five miles off underground trip time," added PacifiCorp spokesman Dave Eskelsen.
